In high school, he volunteered to work in one famous French restaurant in Taipei only to gain precious experiences. Inspired by the then-French-chef, he decided to dedicate his career to French cuisine. He worked hard and saved a big portion of his salary to buy the latest magazines and books about cooking.

When Andre was 20, he became the youngest chef of French cuisine in Taiwan. However, he was not contented. He gave up his handsome-paid job, sold his motorbike and flew to France to work at the three Michelin-starred restaurant Le Jardin des Sens. In his first year working in that restaurant, he worked from 5 am till midnight every day but got no pay. He never complained about it; instead, he was grateful for being able to work and learn in the “dream kitchen.” With a strong will and passion, he survived the first year even though he didn't speak any French. He continued to work six more years in Le Jardin des Sens until his bosses assigned him to extend new branch restaurants in Asia, including Tokyo, Bangkok, Shanghai and Singapore.

Even though Andre has got a really tight schedule every day, he has kept his reading habit. In his autobiography, Andre recalled, “I seldom read recipes, which might limit my ideas and curb my creativity. Rather, I read books about architecture, arts and history so as to enrich myself.” Through his experiences and reading, he came up with the “Octo-philosophy,” in which he used eight elements, or concepts, to make up his dishes. He always knew what his next goal was. In 2014, he returned to his hometown Taipei, and opened a brand new restaurant RAW. The restaurant was named the best restaurant in Taiwan and ranked number 24 in Asia in 2017. Now he dedicates his time not only to running his own business, but also to passing on what he has learned to the next generation in Taiwan.
